Put a Face to a Name - Finding Old Family Photos

Do you know what your ancestors looked like? Genealogists all want to find photographs of our ancestors, but are frustrated few if any old family photos survive in the family. This does not mean the photographs do not exist. Researchers need to think about their ancestors' lives. They need to think about an ancestor's activities and who was in their social circle. Were they in the military? Was faith important to the family? The more information known about one's ancestors, the better the chance of finding a photograph of them. In this session, the researcher will explore both online and offline strategies and resources to search for our ancestors' photos.

Thursday, Feb 27 at 3:00 PM (Room 151)

Using Social History To Fill In Genealogical Gaps

Social history tells the story of our ancestors' lives and can potentially fill in the gaps in our genealogical research. Understanding how our ancestors lived and the events that impacted their lives and community leads the researcher to be able to share their full stories and connections to family. This session will include a discussion of a variety of types of social history records, where to find sources of social history, how to incorporate those sources into one's research.
